Dear Mr. Miller,

I am writing this letter in the hope of planning a meeting with you. I have greatly enjoyed working in our group for the past eight years, I've learned a lot from my time here, and most importantly, I've also brought in more customers for our group with my great service.

I've worked in the Customer Service Department for five years and became a sales leader three years ago. However, I found that my pay is not as high as men in the same job in our group. I don't think it is fair that I get lower pay because I am a woman.

As a working mother, my life is difficult. Before my husband got cancer, he could bring in money to pay for our housing, food bills, and other living costs. The money I made let the kids go to school, take lessons and join clubs. But now I have to keep my family by myself because of my husband's bad health. Besides, our second child is going to college this July. For the reasons above, my money is not enough to run the whole family.

If there is something I can do better, feel free to tell me. I would like to meet with you when you are free. Could you give me a chance to talk further about this with you? I look forward to hearing from you about this matter soon.

Sincerely yours,
Olivia

Smartphones have already become part of our everyday life. Today, it's common for us to see people checking their smartphones anytime and anywhere. People look at their phones not just when they're sitting at home, in the office, or on the MRT but when they are walking around the city or crossing the road. Without taking their eyes off their cellphone, they may hit other people. They can't take their eyes away from their screen long enough to stop themselves from walking into a wall or something else. They may get off the elevator on the wrong floor. If the people are men, they may head into a restroom for women. They don't notice what's happening around them and put themselves in danger. We call these people "smartphone zombies."

Around the world, over a quarter of a million smartphone zombies die on the roads every year. They fail to give attention to other things around them. They usually walk slowly without attention to the cars when their eyes are on their smartphones. Also, most smartphone zombies may have disconnect anxiety. They are likely to feel worried, unhappy, or lonely when not using their smartphones and fear that they may become isolated from their friends if they miss any calls or messages.

To avoid becoming smartphone zombies, we all know we should not use smartphones when walking on the street. But that's not easy because smartphones are a lot of fun. Then how about giving more rules? Honolulu, the largest city in Hawaii, has had a new law since 2017. People in Honolulu face a fine of between $15 and $99, decided by the number of times the police catch them looking at a phone when they cross the street. But if there is no police officer over there, will people follow the rule?

Good news! Here the SINGTECH CORP has a new light for all cities. Some cities have already tried our new type of traffic light to save the lives of smartphone zombies. Workers can quickly fix the lights on the sidewalk at crossings. Even if you don't look up, you will still see a bright red line warning that you are about to step into the road. The lights will turn green if it's safe to cross the street. We call them "zombie lights." You can see our traffic lights in Sydney, Australia, South Korea, the Netherlands, and Singapore. If you have interest, google SINGTECH CORP.

39. Who has disconnect anxiety, Samuel, Ethan, Bomi, or Echo?

Samuel: I feel worried and afraid when I talk to others face to face, so when I need to talk to people, I always send emails or chat with them on the phone.

Ethan: Oh, my eyes get tired easily from looking at the small screens. Although I am young, I need to use special cell phones for older people. I feel sorry for my friends because I check the messages once or twice a day.

Bomi: I don't like to be alone. I need friends, and I feel safe when I am with them. I can't stay in the room without my roommates or friends.

Echo: I can skip meals but can't do without the Internet. I check my phone for new messages every minute, and I can't picture life without the Internet or my smartphone.
