The second Monday of January is Coming-of-Age Day. It is a national holiday in Japan to celebrate those who have grown up and become civilians of a society. This holiday was on January 15, but in 2000 it was moved to the second Monday of that month. An adult in Japan must be twenty years of age or older. That’s when they get the right to vote, and they also can smoke and drink. But along with these rights come new responsibilities, too. So, twenty is an important age for the young people in Japan.

On this day, boys usually wear suits to their coming-of-age ceremony, but a lot of girls choose to wear traditional long-sleeve kimono-- a special kind of clothes, which means that they will start their adults’ lives.

People don’t have as many children as before. In 2022, about 120 thousand joined the ceremony of grown-ups. This is forty thousand fewer than the year before, in 2021. The number of children in Japan is going down, but it is still an important holiday in Japan.
