Corals are colonial organisms. These little organisms are called coral polyps. Coral polyp bodies are usually clear. The bright colors of corals come from different kinds of algae growing in polyps. The algae and corals are helpful to each other. The algae also use the coral's waste products to make its food and create O2 and CO2 for the coral to eat and to build reefs.

Coral reefs provide a home and food for sea animals, and they also help people in some ways. Millions of people around the world catch fish in and around coral reefs. People can also make money from those who swim under the water to see the coral reefs. Coral reefs can also protect people and land from large waves.

Today, the world has lost almost 20% of its coral reefs, with many more reefs in trouble. Pollution and warming sea water cause coral bleaching- that happens when algae leave corals, causing them to turn white, and corals will die. Losing corals can be a big problem for both humans and sea animals. It's important to protect and save coral reefs.
