People sometimes need to make decisions. Students might vote on what book to read or game to play. But on Earth, not only humans can vote. Other animals, from honeybees to baboons, make group decisions. They just do it differently, and for different reasons.

For years, people have studied animals' voting patterns to know the different choices of humans and animals.

Meerkats, like humans, talk about their decisions with others. People found meerkats foraging for food in South Africa. But when a meerkat want to speed up the search, it will make a "move call." If three or more meerkats make this call, the group will speed up.

Humans make decisions like this, too. People say, "If you have a group of people, and one person says, 'Let's go for pizza,' and no one says yes, then nothing is going to happen. But when you have one or two other people saying, 'That's a good idea,' the whole group may go out for pizza."
