William Kamkwamba was born on August 5th, 1987. He grew up in a small town in Malawi, a country in East Africa. There are more than 17 million people living there. It is sometimes called “the warm heart of Africa” for its kind-hearted people. In 2002, the very dry weather lasted for a long time and caused famine in the country. William’s family worked hard all year planting and growing corns, but they got nothing in the end. William had to stop his schooling and help his family search for food as hundred thousands of people across the country died from hunger during a famine.

However, William never let go of his dreams. At the age of 14, he decided to have a different life in the future, so he kept on learning even though he could not go to school. He visited his elementary school library to read more books, especially his favorite—science. He remembered one part of the science textbooks was about electricity and running water, which only 2% of Malawians could pay for and what the West think a need. In William’s village, there was no electric light. With his curiosity, he took up his first windmill after reading “Using Energy”, which led him to test with materials, like a radio motor, parts of his father’s bicycles, and so on. William believed that if he could build his own windmill, he could create electricity using wind power. Electricity would make cooking easier. It would provide the light after dark. With power from a windmill, people could use water from below the ground to plant crops and provide clean drinking water. William believed that his dream of creating electricity with wind power would make life better for everyone in his village.

William's family didn't understand what he was trying to do. His sisters were angry that they had to work in the kitchen while William read books and collected garbage. His mother worried about the garbage he collected. She saw William was going crazy. William's father wasn't sure if his son could make a windmill by using their old broken bicycle parts, but in the end he agreed. Yet, his neighbors and friends laughed at him and the strange ugly big machine.

Finally, in 2002, the windmill was built and worked in his parent's house. His talent quickly drew local, then national, and later international interest that gave him the chance to speak out his thought at a TED conference in the US in 2007. The talk drew people's attention and the support from all over the world quickly grew. People or companies donated to him to start several programs to provide energy and water to poor places. With the help from the people, Kamkwamba finally finished his high school education, and then college education in the USA in 2014. He also went back his country to make people's life better with enough electricity and clean water. William Kamkwamba's story not only shows that the impossible is possible, but also that set-backs should be seen as a chance to find new ways to make your dreams come true.
