A team of American scientists gave a simple smell test to 3,005 people aged from 57 to 85. Each of them was asked to smell and tell the names of five common smells: grass, orange, fish, rose, and leather. The test showed most of the 3,005 people correctly identified at least four of the five smells, 20% got two or three smells right, and 3.5% could only identify one smell or less.

Five years later, the scientists followed up and found that 430 of the 3,005 people had been dead. To get a clear idea about the finding, look at the pie charts below.

What does the smell test show? Does being able to identify smells have something to do with one’s health? The American team hoped that in the near future, their studies would help doctors to identify those who are in poor health in a quick way and at a low cost.

Nothing seems to brighten up a room faster than a bouquet of flowers. While bringing a touch of nature inside, fresh flowers make a room look and smell better. Perhaps that’s why people who are in hospital love flowers so much.

Larsen Jay experienced this for himself. After falling from a building in 2007, Jay was in hospital for weeks. He faced so many difficulties and began losing hope. Jay’s friends and family members, though, came to his rescue. They delivered fresh flowers each day and something wonderful happened. Jay felt better little by little, and he welcome the future with hope. He soon understood that others around him weren’t getting the same type of emotional support. This made him go from room to room, giving away his flowers. Then something amazing happened! He watched people’s sadness quickly turn to happiness.

After leaving the hospital, Jay couldn’t forget the power of his flowers. Within six months, he came up with the idea for Random Acts of Flowers (RAF).

Random Acts of Flowers make use of used flowers which are often from weddings. The flowers are then given to people in hospitals and nursing homes, which are full of old people. In their first year, fewer than 100 people got the service from RAF. But by 2018, RAF had given out close to 300000 bouquets.

According to many studies, fresh flowers can do good to health, such as reducing stress. A different study found that sick people with flowers had shorter hospital stays and lower levels of pain. The University of Tennessee Medical Center did a study on Random Acts of Flowers in 2016. Almost 95 percent of the sick people who had gotten flowers improve their emotional condition.

Time spent in hospitals and nursing homes is no bed of roses. But groups like Random Acts of Flowers are making a difference. They give away fresh flowers to show kindness and speed up healing.
