Lobsters are delicious dishes, and many people around the world love them. However, is boiling live lobsters a kind way to them?

From March 2018, a new law in Switzerland stipulated that lobsters need to be knocked out before they are boiled in hot water because researchers find out that lobsters can feel the pain when people are boiling them. People also need to protect lobsters while moving them.

"Live crustaceans, like the lobster, may not be put on the ice or in ice water while they are moved from one place to another. They must always be in their natural environment," says the new law. The new law comes after an Italian law that said lobsters can't be on ice in restaurant kitchens.

Robert Elwood from Queens University did some experiments that show crustaceans have feelings and that boiling them when they are alive is not kind. "The body of the animal hurts a lot," he says. "We protect other animals like chickens, pigs, and oxen, but we seldom protect crustaceans like lobsters and crabs. But why is there a difference?" Elwood's experiments also show crustaceans will make important life and death choices when they hurt a lot. And it also shows that crustaceans have feelings.

However, the new law doesn't mean taking lobster off the menu. There are kinder ways to take away their lives. And Swiss cooks might now follow the rules.

Many pet dogs spend their days sleeping around the house. They play catch with their owners. They have all their meals in their bowls. Pet dogs give their owners love and friendship. In return, the dogs live lives without worries.

However, some dogs don't have it so easy. They are put to work, but these dogs are not paid in cash. They get food, love and a resting place. Those are the same things that many pet dogs get. Service dogs give more than pet dogs. People use them for hard work. Some dogs guide people who can't see or hear. Other dogs do police work. There are about 15,000 police dogs in the United States. The dogs look for missing people and catch bad guys. Many dogs are also used to look for drugs. Service dogs often work long hours, but pet dogs are free to sleep and play anytime they want to. So, here comes the question: do dogs really have to work?

Yes! Dogs Should Work

Service dogs are workers and pets. Usually, they get more attention than pets. Service dogs often work for their owners, so the dogs spend a lot of time with the people who care for them. Service dogs live happy and useful lives.

Service dogs have to work hard, but they enjoy what they do. Their work can be stressful sometimes. The owners give the dogs lots of love and nice words for their work. This makes the dogs feel good about the work they do.

Police and service work can be dangerous for dogs. Dogs are brave to do this kind of work. They can face danger when they work.

No! Dogs Should Not Work

Dogs are meant to be pets. They live shorter lives than we do, so they should enjoy all of their days. Service dogs are put under too much stress. Their jobs are not fun. Some service dogs do things like getting mail and pulling their owners' wheelchairs. But police dogs are not so lucky. They face life-and-death situations. While people can choose to put their lives on the line, dogs can't.

In 2001, a police dog was shot and killed by police officers. The dog caught a person who the police were running after. The police officers didn't know that the dog was on their side. They thought he was dangerous, so they killed him. But in fact, weeks before the dog was killed, he had worked as a rescue dog when the World Trade Center was attacked in New York City.
